We understand that eBay members might want different accounts for buying or selling, or to focus on different product lines.

undefined

However, in order to maintain a safe and trusted environment for all our users, all accounts that a member uses are held to our buying and selling policies.

Frequently Asked Questions

Are there circumstances when creating another account isn't allowed?

Registering new accounts to avoid buying and selling restrictions or limits, or other policy consequences, is not allowed on eBay.

Can I use one account for buying and one account for selling? Do the same policies apply to each?

Yes, you can use the accounts in whatever way works best for you. Buying and selling policies apply equally to all accounts though, so you'll need to meet our buyer and seller standards across all your accounts.

Multiple account policy overview

There are many reasons why users would choose to have more than one eBay account. For example, users who like to buy and sell may want separate accounts for each activity.

Other users who maintain businesses on eBay may prefer to manage separate accounts for different product lines. Whether you have one account or more, eBay expects users to manage each of their accounts effectively in order to meet the highest buyer and seller standards. These standards and rules regarding performance, risk, and best practices are applicable for each account and help ensure a safe and positive experience on eBay. Users are expected to resolve issues as they arise, and follow the steps provided by eBay to bring accounts back into good standing before continuing to buy or sell with other accounts.
